| Chorus: (str. 1) | Troy, our fatherland, | |
|------------------|--|-----|
| | a city no longer, | |
| | sacked and in ruins, | 610 |
| | for when the cloud of Greeks | |
| | rained down their spears | |
| | a death mantle covered the earth. | |
| | Raping our towered walls, | |
| | they crushed them to ashes and smoke | |
| | a city no more. | |
| (ant. 1) | Midnight, hour of doom, | |
| | long after our dinner, | |
| | sacrifice, dancing, | |
| | our song gave way to sleep, | 620 |
| | sweetest of gifts. | |
| | My husband lay down in our bed, | |
| | putting aside his sword | |
| | and finally closing his eyes | |
| | on war with the Greeks. | |
| (str. 2) | I let my flowing hair down | |
| | and prepared for bed, | |
| | gazing long into my golden mirror's | |
| | endless depths, then gently | |
| | I lay down beside him, | 630 |
| | when suddenly a shout rose through the city, | |
| | a foreign voice, from the bowels | |
| | of the wooden horse: "Sons of Greece, | |
| | isn't it time to bring down this proud city | |
| | and head for home at last?" | |
| (ant. 2) | My husband grabbed his sword hilt | |
| | and raced off to die. | |
| | Rising from my marriage bed I ran out | |

in my single tunic,
like some Spartan maiden,
and joined the women gathered at the altar
of Artemis, supplicating, all of it in vain. Carried off in the Greek ships, we gazed back on Troy's ruins and wept for all we'd lost.

(epode) My curse on Helen, sister of Castor and Pollux, and Paris, who judged the goddesses' beauty.

Aphrodite won, arranging a marriage that wedded Troy to ruin.

May the salt sea drag Helen down, may she never live to see her home in Sparta.
